A large group of people are gathered in a modern, industrial-style space, likely a gallery or event hall. The room features a high ceiling with exposed wooden beams and track lighting. Large digital art projections are displayed on the back wall, showing abstract and still-life imagery. People are dressed in semi-formal attire, and many are holding drinks, suggesting a social or networking event. The overall atmosphere is sophisticated and contemporary.

An aerial, black and white photograph of the Sydney Opera House. The image captures the iconic white, sail-like shells of the building, which are covered in a pattern of small, rectangular tiles. The shells are arranged in a fan-like pattern, with some pointing towards the top left and others towards the bottom right. The surrounding plaza is a large, open space with a grid-like pattern of paving stones. Numerous small figures of people are scattered across the plaza, some walking in groups and others alone, providing a sense of scale to the massive building. Long, dark shadows are cast across the plaza, indicating a low sun position. The overall composition is dynamic and emphasizes the unique architecture of the Opera House.

Championing Seasonality

Danielle on her cooking style today:

“The food I love to make has seasonality at its core. After many years of cooking, the one thing I know is that food picked or harvested at its peak is going to taste better. My food is deeply rooted in old world traditions, mostly of Italy, Spain, France or elsewhere along the Mediterranean and of course, I cannot neglect my Caribbean and Hispanic heritage which may also present itself at the right moment. It can be as eclectic as that sounds but it should never feel chaotic, it should always have a clear thread running through it, which is driven by what’s in season. I am also not afraid to play around with modern techniques and flavour combinations as long as the ingredients remain the stars of the show. I believe that great farming also leads to better tasting food so therefore I try and source from people I know and trust that grow organically and regeneratively.”

Q&A with Danielle Alvarez

What inspired you to pursue a career in the culinary arts, and how has your journey shaped your cooking philosophy?

I grew up in a family that loves food, with parents from Miami and Cuba and grandparents from Spain (Asturias). Our home was the gathering place where my mum hosted amazing dinners, and I fell in love with food and the way it made people feel welcomed and loved. My path wasn't straightforward—I initially studied history and worked in an art gallery before deciding to attend culinary school. An internship at The French Laundry, a 3-Michelin-starred restaurant in California's Napa Valley, changed everything. I worked both in the kitchen and on the floor, which gave me a deep appreciation for all aspects of a restaurant. Moving to California opened my eyes to farm-to-table cuisine, where everything is sourced directly from the garden. It inspired me to cook simply and let the ingredients shine.

You've become known for your focus on seasonal and sustainable ingredients. What drives your commitment to these principles, and how do they influence your menu creation?

I'm inspired by ingredients that come from people who grow them with care—whether it's organic produce or grass-fed meats from local butchers in Sydney. I try to source from farms and work with suppliers who look after the land. Knowing where the food comes from adds a layer of meaning to every dish.

Can you share any particular experiences or mentors that have had a lasting impact on your approach to food and hospitality?

Alice Waters, who owns the iconic Chez Panisse in Berkeley, has been a big influence. She wanted to create a space where friends and family could gather, and her approach to sourcing ingredients directly from farmers shaped the farm-to-table movement. Her passion for making food a central part of life inspired me to emphasise the importance of fresh, quality ingredients.

How do you stay creatively inspired when developing new dishes or concepts for your menus?

Travel is a big inspiration for me, along with Instagram and other chefs. I love going out to eat, trying new things, and talking to fellow chefs. It's important to stay open to new ideas and not let stress stifle creativity.

What is your ultimate goal when people experience your food? What do you hope they take away from the experience?

I want food to complement the overall experience rather than dominate it. My dishes don't have a lot of ego; they're meant to be enjoyed and to tell a story about where the ingredients come from. It's about sharing a moment and a connection.

What challenges have you faced in maintaining your ethos in the competitive restaurant industry, and how do you overcome them?

Sourcing ingredients for large events can be tricky, especially as the business grows. The bigger the group, the harder it is to order from small farms. There are also logistical challenges with long distances. I try to stick to cooking on the fly, using what's available and in season, rather than over-complicating things.

Your approach is often described as soulful and ingredient-driven. How do you balance innovation with staying true to the ingredients and their natural flavours?

I don't push too much on technique; I keep it more classic. It's about letting the ingredients speak for themselves and not over-complicating the flavours.

As a chef, what are your personal favourite ingredients to work with, and why?

I love seasonal fruits and vegetables, especially at the end of summer going into autumn. Figs, tomatoes, pumpkin, grapes, and strawberries are some of my favourites. There's something special about seeing the first strawberries of the season at the farm.

As a leader in the culinary world, how do you mentor and inspire the next generation of chefs in your kitchen?

I enjoy working with people who may not have a lot of experience but have the right attitude. It's important to respect the process and be humble. I encourage young chefs to enjoy the journey—it's not just about putting something on a plate, but understanding every step that goes into it.

Can you share a memorable moment in your career where a dish didn't go as planned, but it led to something unexpectedly wonderful?

There was a time when I was cooking for a set menu of 80-100 guests using a wood-burning fireplace. I had to make a rabbit paella, something I'd never done before, and I ended up burning it. I had to tell the owner, but it taught me a lot about improvisation and dealing with setbacks.

Which would you say is the best event you've cooked at?

Probably VIVID. The combination of art, culture, and cuisine, especially working alongside Kate Noonan, made it a special experience.

What signature dishes or seasonal ingredients would you recommend highlighting in our menu for upcoming events?

For summer, anything with tomatoes is a must. For desserts, mango, passion fruit, and raspberries are wonderful. Fresh seafood, like oysters, also feels festive and fits perfectly with the Sydney setting.

Are there any signature techniques or presentations you're excited to showcase that align with the elegance of the Opera House?

I prefer to keep things authentic. I want the food to look like it is, celebrating the natural beauty of Australia.

Do you include native ingredients in your menus?

Yes, but only if they make sense from a flavour perspective. I use lemon aspen in my lemon tart and finger limes on occasion. I'm happy to explore bespoke menus that incorporate more native ingredients.

How do you minimize food waste in your kitchens?

We do things like making bread crackers out of leftover bread. As an event space, we try to find creative ways to reduce food waste wherever possible.

What are some considerations when guests have specific requests, like dietary preferences?

We can accommodate changes, such as removing coriander from a tuna tartare or adjusting the cooking level of a beef fillet. The important thing is to maintain flavour, tenderness, and the overall quality of the dish.

How often do you refresh your menus, and where do you find inspiration for new ideas?

We change the menu every six months. I'm constantly inspired by cookbooks and the changing seasons, allowing for natural shifts in the ingredients we use.
